

George Oster, UC Berkeley Departments of Environmental Science, Policy and Management; and Molecular and Cell Biology

“The world's smallest rotary motor”

April 29, 1999

The universal fuel in cells is ATP. The enzyme that manufactures ATP, called ATP synthase, is the most remarkable of all molecular machines. It can use a proton gradient to produce ATP, or it can use ATP as fuel to pump protons. In both modes it operates as a rotary molecular motor. A mathematical model can explain quantitatively how this protein works.